

That quiet moment, when sun greets the sky and she flushes pink. Her dress, the purest white Covers the silent grass and leaves from sight,
And the flowers now hide their faces, shy.

See now the old men, with arms held so high
As if in prayer, untouched by frigid blight
Yet quiet still, no green to crown old might,
For the summer has truly bid goodbye.

Wake now from your slumber, and see morning Light peer through the window, grass covered in Fresh snow, trees reaching up, up with spindly Limbs now bare and dry. Savor this moment, when All is quiet, and time is not turning,
For the world rarely is so simple.
